

Book Summary

Fabric of a Generation is a tale of family and adolescent uncertainty. In the novel, sixteen-year-old Miranda Wilson must learn the balance between duty, love, faith, and discipline.

Miranda, a rebellious teen, dreams of disappearing. That and torturing her younger brainiac of a brother. To side step the risk of personal vulnerability (and her much-hated history class), she plays soccer or skips school by escaping to her favorite magic shop whenever she gets the chance.

Miranda's relationships are laced with the strychnine of blame, envy, and doubt. As her truancy creates a rift between her ambitious TV producer mother and misunderstood stay-at-home carpenter father, Miranda begins to covet the unknown destiny of strangers and questions whether she will ever have one of her own worth living.

When Miranda finds a mystical object in the attic, her discovery initiates a free fall through time. Miranda thinks all her dreams have come true, but as she navigates through the hilarious, treacherous, and heartbreaking road to maturity, the strained relationship between her and her mother ignites a troubled path to selflessness and compassion.

Can she use her present circumstances to help redeem herself from her past mistakes? If Miranda cannot find her way back home, she might be forever stuck in time.

Anyone seeking a coming-of-age tale with an addicting family saga that explores life lessons on faith, money, love, and relationships will enjoy the rabbit-hole adventures of this book.
